In this course, students will focus on three facets of meeting global nutritional needs – knowing where food comes from (conventional and local food systems), what it means for the people who grow and sell food at local markets, and the leadership and management skills needed to build alliances to take on youth hunger and food access.

Field work in both Iowa and India will provide a comparative approach to studying nonprofit organizational development. In Iowa, students will visit the Grow: Johnson County farm with an opportunity to volunteer and meet with their staff. In India, students will learn about the NGOs working to address hunger and food access and work with India chefs to explore Southern India's food culture.
